

How the Elephant got It's Tusks

Once upon a time there was an elephant named, Poblo. He was an ordinary Elephant but with a lot of questions. Pablo was eating dinner when he felt something strange get stuck in his cheeks. He asked his friends and family what it was but they couldn't see anything. So he went to the elephant doctor, doctor Elephantiasis, to see what was stuck in his cheeks. Doctor Elephantiasis said, "it was only two big pointy rocks." The doctor tried and tried to get them out, but he couldn't. So Poblo went home and knew he would just have to live with it. His friends and family loved him so much and they didn't want him to feel bad so they put rocks in their mouths, too. Eventually, the rocks got lodged in to all of the elephants jaw bones. Poblo and the other elephants became very concern and they didn't know what to do. Eventually, the rocks started to grow out of their cheeks. This caused great alarm, but as time went on, the elephants realized that the rocks growing out their faces became very handy. They could now knock down fruit from trees, fight off their enemy's, and dig in the ground a lot easier. The rocks continued to grow and grow and they eventually became a great source of pride. Poblo was the most proud because his rocks were the biggest of all. Poblo called them his tusks and the name stuck.
